In a previous column in the Media Institute blog (Feb. 17, 2015), I urged that any copyright reform legislation that emerges from the Dutch editorial model must include both author attribution and remunerative interests. The more authorial content of this column will curiously determine, a matter that has long been subject of copyright reform in the United States and in Europe as well.

The Anglo-American legal tradition, not generally known for solicitude toward the weaker party in contract negotiations, has dealt with this matter that has lately been the subject of copyright reform in the Netherlands and France as well.
